And a little child shall lead them...

by Sr. Joan Chittister, OSB - for the National Catholic Reporter

Between 1900 and 2018 there have been at least 146 protest marches and rallies, gatherings of people to express their social and political views, in Washington, D.C. It is a time-honored way of making sure that the government “hears” the people, their passion and their political aspirations. The First Amendment allows this kind of speech and the government protects it.

Now we have another protest brewing, the March for Our Lives, which is being led by students. This First Amendment display of complaint is to protest the use of the Second Amendment to protect the widespread availability of military-style weapons on American streets.

It’s difficult to tell exactly what is driving the student anti-gun demonstrations that are taking place all across the country: It may, of course, be the actions of the most recent shooting at Marjory Stoneman Douglas in High School in Parkland, Florida.

On the other hand, it may equally be the non-action of adults. Since the shootings at Columbine in 1999, at Sandy Hook Elementary School in 2012, and the 50 other mass murders or attempted mass murders at schools since then – 17 of them by children under the age of 15 – not one piece of national legislation has been passed to either stop the shootings or protect the victims, though some has at the state level.

Since no one else is doing anything about it, the young people have taken it upon themselves. They lay the responsibility directly at the feet of the politicians who define themselves as the guardians of the democracy. The students’ March for Our Lives on Washington, D.C. scheduled for March 24, defines three issues for resolution: age restrictions on gun purchase, a ban on assault-style weapons, and the demilitarization of police forces.
The point is that we now have two tragedies here: the first is the mounting numbers of deaths in classrooms, the second is the seeming political indifference to it. Where being re-elected in a country obsessed with guns is obviously more important than protecting schoolchildren, politicians have refused to regulate the sale of guns by either age or category.

As a result, young people can get a gun in the United States before they get a diploma and with it the hoped-for control it takes to decide how and when to use it. Worse, adults argue back at student activists with a straight face that taking military-style weapons off the streets would violate the Second Amendment rights of sportsmen. The adult arguments clearly do not persuade: “Protect children, not guns” one of the protest signs says, as students walk through city streets in protest. ~NCR

Praying for Their Student Peers

Sr. Renee Kittelson, MSC (4th r.) leads the CHS students in the rosary during the National Walkout Day.

Along with the rest of the Archdiocese of New Orleans, Cabrini High School (CHS) gathered together for a 17-minute rosary prayer service on Wednesday, March 14, 2018 to end violence in schools. Led by the Cabrini Rosary Club, the entire student body, faculty, and staff said two decades of the rosary, our Family Prayer, and students rang bells 17 times in honor of the 17 people who lost their lives in the Stoneman Douglas High School tragedy. ~submitted by Katelyn Gross, CHS
Ali* shares his story:

I was born in Somalia. There are six children in my family and our mum and my father passed away due to illness. I left my country when I was young and moved all the way from Africa to Europe. The journey was not easy and it took me close to a year to get to Ukraine, but I was not satisfied because it was not my final destination.

My transition to the life in the United States was not easy because I had to overcome lots of difficult language and cultural differences and I did not have parents to support me.

There is a big difference between the U.S. and my country. Here, there are many laws, but my country was lawless. My life is good at the moment. I graduated from high school and I am in college using every possible opportunity I get. I wish I knew that life here is not as easy as you think. You have to work very hard.

The hardest part was the long process of waiting at the camp to be resettled.

I would like to share this advice for parents. They should encourage and motivate their children to go to school and attend after school programs. They should also be in touch with their children’s teachers and counselors. America is an open society with many opportunities and they should use them because they are lucky to be here.

I also have some advice for teachers. My senior English teacher made my transition easier. She is an inspiring teacher. She motivated me a lot and has a sense of humor. Teachers should get to know their students well and help them with classes, homework and some students’ fear to speak in public.

Additionally, I have some advice for immigrant teens. Work hard and never get into drugs or alcohol; they will ruin your life. Just pay attention and do what is right.

My future goals? I want to study international relations so that I can help the U.S. relations with the rest of the world. One day I want to go back to my country and make it democratic, like it used to be before the civil war. ~ Justice for Immigrants

Palm Sunday

Each Gospel sought the meaning of Jesus’ suffering and death, not only for Jesus’ life but for all human life. For Mark, the death of Jesus is the climax of a life for others. In his passage from death to life, Jesus is proclaimed as the triumphant son of man. His death reveals God’s power at work in weakness. The way of the disciple must be the way of the cross. The church is, through the experience of the cross, to be a non-triumphant, reconciled church that must be open to outsiders. The church is called to be a living “temple” open to all people and suffused with the spirit of the crucified Christ. The passion reveals that the redemptive mission of the church is world-wide and costly.

We Wish to See Jesus
These words, like so many others in the Gospels, go beyond this particular episode and express something universal. They reveal a desire that passes through the ages and cultures, a desire present in the heart of so many people who have heard of Christ, but have not yet encountered him.

To those who are searching for God, we can offer three things: the Gospel, the crucifix and the witness of our faith. The Gospel: there we can encounter Jesus, listen to him, know him. The crucifix: the sign of the love of Jesus who gave himself for us. And then a faith that is expressed in simple gestures of fraternal charity, but, mainly in the coherence of life, between what we say and what we do.
